Message: It seems that suburban San Mateo is going to continue to morph into an urban community, regardless of how many of its citizens object, and in spite of the insufficient water and other resources necessary to support a burgeoning population. So if we are going to turn our town into a high-rise city, how do we want that city to be? We just returned from Vancouver, BC, a beautiful city that seems to have handled its population boom pretty well. In addition to all these meetings and surveys, have General Plan members investigated similar cities to see how they handled their growth? Can we observe, and learn from, similar challenges that have been successfully managed elsewhere?
